

French & Francophone Studies Minor

French and Francophone Studies majors at Georgetown enjoy a number of opportunities that enable them to achieve among the highest levels of linguistic and cultural competency with respect to their peers at other top-tier universities. After achieving linguistic proficiency, French and Francophone Studies majors develop an in-depth critical appreciation of French and Francophone cultures and literatures; they acquire the tools to analyze and interpret texts; and they continue to refine their linguistic knowledge through the exploration of a rich variety of content areas. Eligible French and Francophone Studies majors also have the opportunity to write a Senior Honors Thesis, which serves as a capstone for their studies and allows them to showcase and further refine their research and writing skills.

Students should select appropriate courses in consultation with their advisors and the Director of Undergraduate Studies, particularly with reference to their overall academic and career goals.

Minor in French and Francophone Studies

Students majoring in other subjects are welcome to minor in French. French minors achieve proficiency in the French language and then further develop their understanding of the French and Francophone world. By complementing their primary fields of study with a minor in French and Francophone Studies, students will bolster their linguistic, cultural, and literary knowledge and further their exploration of the humanities. Students' enhanced exposure to French and Francophone cultures comes coupled with more sophisticated writing, research, and critical thinking abilities.
